

Prize Stories from Colliers 1896-1916, Vol. 5

The Prize Stories from Colliers was originally published in 1916. The stories were selected by Henry Cabot Lodge, Theodore Roosevelt, Walter H. Page, William Allen White, Ida M. Tarbell and Mark Sullivan. The period during which these short stories were picked from the great body of those that were being written, represented the high-water mark of the development of this form of literature. To discuss adequately the place which the short story has come to fill in American literature would consume more space than is here available. What had happened during the twenty years between 1896-1916 was a literary phenomenon. With a larger space it would be possible to show that it was also a social and economic phenomenon. It is natural that the short stories in this volume should constitute a picture of American life during the period covered, which is, on the whole, in spite of the omission of many familiar phases, accurate and adequate. Anyone who reads the stories must reflect on the wide variety of the phases of American life, of which in these volumes intimate and accurate pictures are given. The principal prize winning story, Fagan, by Rowland Thomas, is a picture of the strange juxtaposition brought about by the anomalous American excursion into the East - an American Negro serving as a trooper in the fantastic background of the Philippines. Another of the prize winners, The Trawler, by James B. Connolly, is a picture crystallized and written down by Mr. Connolly just at a time when that phase of American life was more or less passing out of existence, when the dory driven by the arm of the oarsman was being supplanted by the motor driven boat.
